CONCLUSION. It was somewhat about the end of January that I was sitting one day by the fireside in the dear old study, as the frosty twilight was closing in. Jack was looking after his farm, but had bidden me stay in out of the cold; and I was musing happily, with my head laid back in his own big arm-chair, and my feet toasting on the fender, listening for the sound of his footsteps. It had been unusually cold for a week or more, and he had been kept very busy looking after his live stock in consequence, especially some very valuable young cattle, which seemed to want as much sheltering and coddling as if they had been racehorses in training, and a quantity of unfortunate little lambs which had arrived ever so much sooner than the world was ready for them....
